The knight brought the horse into the field. It followed slowly with its black mane shimmering, giving it an outward expression of its anger. As the knight struggled to pull the horse he regretted his decision to take on this horse.

once they reached the center of the field he tied the horse to a nearby tree and quickly stood back breathing hard. They stood there staring at one another under the hot sun. The wind blowing in the trees was the only sound to be heard. The knight mustered up his courage and took a step forward. the horse

Words placed on a page can feel like they are moving and will get switched around inside the dyslexics mind. The dyslexic tries to understand things in their environment by flipping them around in their mind until the object make sense. However this process does not work with reading. Reading is linear, while dyslexics tend to be creative with the direction of their thinking. In this picture the brain represents how a dyslexic reads stories while the words on the outside represent the jumbling of letters that cannot be imagined.
